

News...

Planning Permission Secured for Enderby Wharf Greenwich.

BBC News - 28th January 2011

BBC Mobile News Sport Weather IPayer TV Radio More Search BBC News

NEWS LONDON

Home World UK England N. Ireland Scotland Wales Business Politics Health Education Sci/Environment Technology Entertainment & Arts

28 January 2011 Last updated at 15:01

Greenwich cruise liner terminal plans approved

London is set to get its first cruise liner terminal after plans were approved by Greenwich Council.

Enderby Wharf will provide a docking for cruise liners and the Thames Clipper, along with a 251-room hotel and 770 new homes.

Work is due to start at the end of 2011, subject to approval from Greater London Authority, and expected to take four to five years.

Work is expected to take four to five years.

But developers hope the terminal will be completed for the 2012 Olympics.

Enderby House, a Grade II-listed building, will be extended to provide tourist, community and retail facilities, as part of the plan.

James Blakey, planning director at West Properties, said Greenwich was chosen out of 11 possible sites across London.

"The area has a rich maritime history and Enderby House was referenced in Moby Dick.

"At the heart of the proposals is the provision of an international cruise liner terminal in the maritime heartland of Greenwich and London."

Top Stories

- Libyan crackdown 'escalates' - UN
- UK contraction worse than thought
- Discovery sets out on last voyage
- No survivors as NZ search goes on
- Cut red meat to lower cancer risk

Features & Analysis

- Fresh start
Could Jim Davidson be reinvented for a 21st Century audience?
- Keep on smiling
Why work, sleep and bicycles equals happiness
- Gaping hole
House smashed by boulder at New Zealand quake epicentre
- 7 days quiz
If Lady Gaga is a pop star, what is 'Baby Gaga'?